PARENTS IN PRISON & WHAT IT'S DOING TO CHILDREN

1.5 million children in the U.S. have a parent in state or federal prison

That's more than the number of children in Washington DC, Nebraska, and Oregon combined.

Children with incarcerated parents fare worse than other children.
Compared with similarly vulnerable children, those with a parent who has ever been incarcerated are...

- 25% more likely to experience material hardship
- 32% more likely to have parents living separately
- 44% more likely to show aggressive behavior

There are alternatives to prisons.
Of the 1.6 million individuals in state and federal correctional facilities, 330,000 were imprisoned for drug offenses. Several initiatives and programs try to assist harsh mandatory minimum sentences for low-level, nonviolent drug offenders, including a new policy by Attorney General Eric Holder. Results show that they can not only help families, but reduce recidivism (committing crime again). Here are some things these programs focus on:

- Restorative Justice
This practice rests on the idea that crimes hurt human relationships and justice is a process of healing and making amends. Practices include dialogue between offenders and victims, helping offenders take responsibility and improve behaviors in the community.
- Substance Abuse Treatment Services
Reducing drug dependency helps individuals stop the cycle of abuse that leads to criminal activity. Approaches vary by program, but common practices include individual and group counseling, case management, and treatment plans.
- Training and Education Programs
Some programs also work with offenders to train them in life skills. From parenting classes to vocational trainings, these classes help offenders build alternative skills that can replace destructive behaviors.
- Needs Assessments & Monitoring
To contribute to the research base and to improve service delivery, successful programs track their progress and use individual and group data to make sure their services are giving the best help and support.
